Studies show that it is especially important for both parents to create a living space that feels like a real second home for the children and to find a way to have one-on-one time with each child (perhaps mid-week visits with one child at a time). Also both parents need to attend school meetings and doctor's appointments and not rely on getting all their information from the other party (who are not always willing to share the parenting role despite complaints about being left to deal with everything).
